

B: Like many people living in Canada now, I arrived from, I was born in another country and then now choosing to live in Canada. My experience of Canada is largely limited to the northwest coast here in BC. I came here expecting much space, wilderness, wildness, and the place that I have chosen as my home has satisfied those expectations. I think that Canada is often viewed in the world as being quite progressive, largely due to its reputation as a safe nation, I suppose. A place where many people have come to. One of the things that's become part of my experience is exposure to First Nations and First Nations culture that I wouldn't have learned of or about or been exposed to had I not come here. From a distance, Canada seems to be one homogenous nation, but having lived here for 7 years now I think my perception is that, not only is it many cultures but also many biological zones, many different climates, many different faces. And I think that makes Canada a complex country with many virtues.
